

OCCUPATIONAL HYGIENE AWARENESS

Overview

Increasing industrial activity world-wide means that there are more people exposed to chemical and physical agents such as dusts, solvents and noise with the potential to cause work related diseases such as silicosis, cancer and noise induced hearing loss. New technologies also pose new risks.

Occupational hygiene focuses on a preventative approach through the minimisation of exposure to chemical, physical and biological agents in the work environment to achieve prevention of work-related diseases.

Objectives

This introductory course explains the importance of thinking about the health hazards in your workplace that could lead to work-related diseases amongst workers. It will also provide information to help you identify these risks to health and how they can be effectively managed.

Who should attend?

This short course is suitable for anyone who would be interested in learning more about the importance of health risks in the workplace and how they can be managed including directors, managers, safety professionals and representatives.
